Cesspool (se·sˌpūl). Forms: 7 cest-, 9 sus-, sess-, 8– cesspool. [Of uncertain derivation.

The form cesperalle has suggested connexion or popular confusion, with SUSPIRAL breathing hole, air-hole, ventilator, q. v. The form cestpool, if genuine (compared with the dial. 'cist, a cesspool' in Halliwell) has suggested that the initial element may be a contraction of cestern, CISTERN, or at least that it has at some time been associated by popular etymology with that word. Prof. Skeat compares the form suspool with the dial. words suss 'hogwash', soss 'anything dirty or muddy' (Halliwell); others have proposed derivation from CESS sb.[4] bog. More suitable is that from It. cesso privy (:—L. secessus place of retirement, privy, drain), esp. as this is also commonly used for cessino the solid contents of the cesso, 'materie grosse che si cavano dalle cloache delle case, che servano per ingrasso dei terreni' (La Crusca). The spelling sess-pool taken with the essential meaning of a 'pool for the retention of sediment', might indicate connexion with L. sedēre, sess-um in sense 'to sink, settle down'. But all these are merely suggestions, calling for further evidence.]

1. A small well or excavation made in the bottom of a drain, under a grating, to collect and retain the sand or gravel carried by the stream.

NICHOLSON Pract. Build. 592/2 Sesspool, or Cesspool, a deep hole or well, under the mouth of a drain, for the reception of sediment, etc., by which the drain might be choked.

2. A well sunk to receive the soil from a water-closet, kitchen sink, etc.: properly one which retains the solid matter, and allows the liquid to escape.

It is sometimes built dry, so that the water escapes by percolation through the joints of the stone or brickwork into the surrounding soil, or it is built in mortar, and a drain formed to carry off the surplus water from near the top of it. (Gwilt.)

CH, a consonantal digraph, which in various languages (e.g. Welsh, Spanish, Bohemian) is treated as a distinct letter, placed in the Alphabet after C. In English it is not so treated formally, but in its characteristic and proper sound (tʃ) which it has in all native words, it practically adds an additional symbol to the alphabet. It has, however, in English other values; viz. those in chyle, and champagne, which might be expressed otherwise by k and sh; and that in loch, which occurs only in Scotch, Welsh, or foreign words.

The combination CH was foreign to native Roman spelling; it was introduced to represent the Greek aspirate or affricate X (as Θ, Φ, were similarly represented by TH, PH). In Latin practice, however, simple c was often substituted, e.g. χάρτης, charta, carta, χαιρέφυλλον, chærephyllum, cærefolium, and this represented the actual pronunciation, for in the development of the Romanic languages, ch in popularized words was treated precisely as c. But in these languages, the symbol ch has been laid hold of for various purposes. In Italian it is a supplemental symbol used to indicate the hard or (k) sound of c before the vowels i and e, where c itself stands for (tʃ), as in archi (arkī) pl. of arco, chi (kī):—L. qui. In very early French, it also occurs in the writing of some dialects, or some scribes, with the value of (k); but its typical OF. use was to represent the palatalized sound which Central Old French developed from original c (k) before a, as in L. carrus, cārus, causa, OF. char, chier, chose, but which Northern Old French, on the other hand, developed from c before e and i, as in chertain, cachier, cherise, where Central Old French had c (=ts), certain, chacier, cerise. The symbol ch was not used (or only accidentally) in OE.; for, although the sound (tʃ) was already developed in English before the 10th c., it was still written c(e), as in ceosan, ceaster, fecc(e)an. But at the Norman Conquest, the symbol ch was introduced from France, and used not only for the new French words as charite, richesse, but also in the OE. words as in cheosen, chester, fecche, etc. This value of the digraph has ever since been retained in English, while in French the sound was at length worn down from (tʃ) to (ʃ), as in chief, chef, OF. (tʃ'ɐf) now (ʃɐf), Eng. chief (tʃīf). Where the c was originally double, and after a short vowel, the early writing was cch, but subsequently tch, as in OE. wrecc(e)a, ME. wrecche, now wretch. After a long vowel, simple ch is used, as in coach, teach, brooch; but sometimes (from various historical causes) simple ch occurs after a short vowel, as in rich, much, and tch (rarely) after a long vowel, as in aitch. After a consonant (preserved or lost) simple ch is used, as in perch, which, such.

The sound (tʃ) also occurs in Slavonic and many non-European languages, and is usually spelt ch in words thence taken into English, as in chabouk, chark, cheetah, chintz, chouse.

CH has the sound of (k) in words taken from Greek (or Hebrew through Greek) directly, or through Latin, Italian, or French, as in chasm, chimera, chirography, chyle, Rechabite. Only in a few of these, which were popular words in Romanic, e. g. cherub, archbishop, does the (tʃ) sound occur.

CH has the sound of sh (ʃ) in words from modern French; occasionally in words really from Old French, which are now erroneously treated as if from modern French, as chivalry, champaign.

CH has also the value of a guttural spirant (χ); but this is not a native English sound, and is only used in English in an accurate pronunciation of Scotch, Celtic, Dutch, German, Slavonic, or Oriental words, in which the sound occurs. This sound existed in OE., but was there written h (and g) as in burh, riht; for this the Norman scribes substituted the digraph gh (burgh, right), which is still retained, though the sound was lost in the 16-17th century. The same digraph is used to represent the Irish guttural spirant in lough, Monaghan, curragh; but the Celtic languages themselves use ch (as in Welsh Machynlleth and Gaelic clachan), and this is followed in Lowland Scotch, as in loch, pibroch, broch, tocher. The Old Teutonic languages generally used h or hh for this sound, as in Goth. mahts, OS. and OHG. maht, OE. meaht; but ch (rarely kh) was introduced initially, in Upper German, for the affricated sound of c (k) as chamara (kχa·măra), chirihha, chalch, whence it was extended to the spirant (χ), and gradually substituted for the earlier OHG. spelling h, hh; so that this is now regularly written ch in German and Dutch: cf. Goth. ahtau, OS. and OHG. ahto, OE. eahta, mod.G. and Du. acht eight. The same symbol is used for this sound in most Slavonic languages which use the Roman alphabet, and thus sometimes in the Romanization of Russian X (Cherson, Astrachan), and also of the kindred sounds in some Eastern languages (where however kh is more general); and from all these sources it enters to some extent into English spelling, though the mere English reader usually pronounces it as (k).

As OE. c(e)-, c(i)-, has regularly become ch-, these constitute one important section of the CH-words in modern English; another consists of the Old French words in ch- from L. ca-. Of the rest, the chief are those derived from Gr. words in χ-, directly, or through L. (Italian, French) ch-. The remainder consist of a few words from Slavonic or non-European languages, or of onomatopœic origin.

CH initial interchanges with C, K, SH. Since Old Northern French retained the ca-, which Central French changed to cha-, che-, French words were often adopted in English in both forms, usually first from Northern (Norman) French, and afterwards from Central French. Sometimes one, sometimes the other, sometimes both, of these have survived, see e. g. CAITIFF, CAMEL, CAMPION, CHAMPION, CANNEL, CHANNEL, CANAL, CHALICE, CHAMP, CATCH, CHASE, CHACCHE, CATTLE, CHATTEL. The Northern English also in certain cases resisted the palatalization of OE. c, or took the parallel k form of Norse or Low German: hence northern caf, CAUK, KIRK, CARL, KEESLEP, beside southern CHAFF, CHALK, CHURCH, CHURL, CHEESLEP. Cf. on the other hand Kentish chalf = CALF. Confusion between ch, sch, sh, was not infrequent in ME., e. g. schin = CHIN, chever = SHIVER. This was sometimes graphical, but partly also dialectal; there are varieties of northern dialect which still use initial (ʃ) for (tʃ). Variant forms like CHACO, SHAKO, CHAGRIN, SHAGREEN, champoo, SHAMPOO, are of more recent, and chiefly of phonetic origin.

† Ch, 'ch, pron. dial. Obs. Aphetic form of ich, utch, southern form of the first personal pronoun I, occurring before verbal forms beginning with a vowel, h, or w; chiefly with auxiliary verbs, but also with others; as in cham (tʃam), (earlier icham) I am, cha, chave (earlier ichabbe) I have, chad I had, chard I heard, chill I will, chold, chud I would, chote I wot, etc.

Found in remains of s. e. (Kentish) dial. in 16th and early 17th c., in s. w. dialect 16-18th c., and often introduced in specimens of dialect speech in the dramatists. Now obsolete; though utchill = I will, and utchy = I, were still heard in 1875, in remote parts of Somersetshire. (See Prince L. L. Bonaparte in Phil. Soc. Trans. 1875-6 p. 580.) Utchy corresponds to the 16th c. CHE; see further under ICH.

Chaff (tʃaf), sb.[2] colloq. [Of this and the related CHAFF v.[2], the origin is not quite certain: if the sb. is earlier, it may be a fig. use of prec. (cf. senses 5, 6 there); if the vb. is the starting point, it may be a playful or light use of chaff, CHAFE v., senses 5 and 6 of which come very near to it.]

Banter, light and good-humoured raillery, or ridicule, calculated to try the temper of the person to whom it is addressed; badinage. (App. of slang origin, and still somewhat vulgar.)

(The first quot. is uncertainly placed: it may mean 'scolding': cf. CHAFE v. 6.)

[1648 JENKYN Blind Guide iv. 76 You pretend to nothing but chaffe and scoffes.] 1840 DICKENS Barn. Rudge (C. D. ed.) 42, 'I do', said the 'prentice. 'Honour bright. I. General sense.

1. A connected series of links (of metal or other material) passing through each other, or otherwise jointed together, so as to move on each other more or less freely, and thus form a strong but flexible ligament or string.

Chains differ in structure according to the shape of their links and the mode in which these are united; also in material and size, in accordance with their purpose of fastening, restraint, traction, ornament, etc. Hence such qualifying attributes as gold, iron, cable, draught, watch, etc.

Chaise (ʃēz). Also 8 chaiz, (shazess). [a. mod. F. chaise (chaize Cotgr.), a phonetic alteration of chaire (so Pazis for Paris, etc.), established in the ordinary sense 'chair', whence by extension 'sedan-chair', and by transference a wheeled vehicle for travelling in. In this later sense alone chaise passed into English, notwithstanding that chair had itself here received the same development (see CHAIR *sb.*¹ 11, which however was not always an exact synonym of this word, but often used as the name of a particular sort of chaise). (Cathedra, chair, chaise, are thus all forms of the same word.) The vulgar take (ʃēiz) for a plural sb., and form on it a singular (ʃēi) CHAY, SHAY.

(The change of lingual r to z in French is a phenomenon widely exemplified. It appears fully established at Orleans in 15th c., but did not come down beyond 1620.)]

1. A term applied to various pleasure or travelling carriages, the exact application having varied from time to time:

a. A light open carriage for one or two persons, often having a top or calash; those with four wheels resembling the phaeton, those with two the curricle; also loosely used for pleasure carts and light carriages generally.

Kersey, Bailey, Ash and Johnson explain chaise as 'a carriage for pleasure drawn by one horse'; Todd says this was the case formerly, before post-chaises were in request, and defines it as 'A chaise and pair; a chaise and four: the term of later days for a light vehicle, with four wheels, drawn by two or four horses'.

Chalcedony, calcedony (kælse·dəni, kæ·lsĭdəni). Forms: α. 4 calsydoyne, calcidoine; β. 4 chalcedun, 6–8 calcedon, 7–8 chalcedon; γ. (4–5 calcedonius), 5 calsydony, calcideny, (6 chalcedonium), 7 calchedonie, calsidonie, chalcidonye, 5– calcedony, 6– chalcedony. See also CASSIDOINE, -DONY. [The current form c(h)alcedony is directly adapted from L. c(h)alcedonius, used in the Vulgate to render Gr. χαλκηδών, in Rev. xxi. 19, the name of the precious stone forming the third foundation of the New Jerusalem, but found nowhere else. Adapted forms of the same word in OF. were calce-, calcidoine, whence the ME. calcidoine, calcedun; also cassidoine, whence ME. CASSIDOINE and its varieties, which are separately treated. The 16th c. chalcedon was perh. directly from N. T. Greek.

The word is of very complicated history. The L. is commonly assumed to be the same as the adj. chalcēdonius of Chalcedon in Asia Minor, as if it were 'Chalcedonian stone', but this is very doubtful. In interpreting the name in the Vulgate, which has the variant form carcedonius, the early writers identified it with a stone mentioned by Pliny xxvii. §§ 103, 104, where MSS. have the variants carchedonia, charcedonia, calcedonia, calchedonia, carchedonius, said to be found in North Africa, and to be brought by way of Carthage (Καρχηδών), which, from the description, could have nothing to do with the chalcedony of the moderns. Isidore has carchedonia; Epiphanius de Gemmis iv, says it is produced ἐν Καρχηδόνι τῆς Λιβύης. The carchedonius or chalcedonius is mentioned and moralized upon by a whole catena of writers, including esp. Bæda; but to none of them was it more than a traditional name, about which there clustered notions originally derived from Pliny with an accretion of later fables. The first to try to identify it with any known stone was apparently Albertus Magnus (1205–1282), who may have had in view some form of the stone to which the name is now given. (See the exhaustive article of Schade Altdeutsches Wbuch. 1363.)

A precious (or semi-precious) stone, which in its various tints is largely used in lapidary work: a cryptocrystalline sub-species of quartz (a true quartz, with some disseminated opal-quartz), having the lustre nearly of wax, and being either transparent or translucent.

It is not safe to carry the modern application back before the 16th or at earliest the 15th c.; and references to earlier notions come down to the 17th. In modern lapidary work, chalcedony receives different names according to its varieties of colour and structure, as agate, cornelian, cat's eye, chrysoprase, onyx, sard, etc. Most of the varieties were included by Pliny under his jaspis. [L. calix, calic-em cup, has appeared in Eng. in various forms. (1) Early OE. cęlic, genitive cęlces, corresp. to OS. kelik (MDu. kelec, kelc, Du. kelk), OHG. kelihh, chelih (MHG. and mod.G. kelch):—WGer. kalik*, an early (pre-Christian) adoption of L. calic-em. (2) The Latin word was re-adopted in later OE., in Christian use, as calic, cælic, cælc, whence early ME. calc, calch (cf. ON. kalk-r). (3) These were ousted in 12th c. by the OF. caliz, calice. (4) Before 1350 this was in turn ousted by a central OF. form chalice, which gave Eng. chalis, chalice. While this was the case in English, in France itself calice was the form which came down to modern French. (OF. caliz, calice was of learned origin, but early enough to undergo the phonetic change to chalice in central F.; in the struggle between the two forms, the influence of L. calix, familiar in ecclesiastical use, was effective in making calice the ultimate victor.) Strictly, cel(i)c, calch, calice, chalice, are separate words; but their relations are best seen by treating them together.]

2. An opaque white soft earthy limestone, which exists in deposits of vast extent and thickness in the south-east of England, and forms high cliffs along the sea-shore.

Chemically, chalk consists of carbonate of lime with some impurities. Geologically, it is a deep-sea formation composed of fragments of shells of Foraminifera, abounding in certain important animal fossils, and interspersed with nodules of flint. It is burned for lime, and prepared for writing or marking on blackboards or other dark surfaces. In 17–18th c. it is often mentioned as eaten by young women suffering from chlorosis: cf. quot. 1811.

If sense 1 was, as it appears to be, the earlier, then the persons so called were probably really in minor orders, or at least preparing for such. It is probable that these often supported themselves by acting as domestic chaplains, or even as ordinary domestics or 'scouts' to well-to-do scholars or others willing to entertain them, and that hence arose sense 2. A University Statute quoted by Antony à Wood sub anno 1432 mentions alicui scholari, sive alicuius scholaris servienti. Wood's conjecture that the word was a corruption of in camerâ degentes, i. e. living not in any academical hall, but in lodgings (as non-collegiate students), belongs to pre-scientific 'etymology', but it is not easy to say whether the chamber-dekyns of sense 1 were named from living in their own chambers, or, as those of sense 2 were, from keeping the chambers of others.]

The usual spelling down to the present century was camelion; cameleon being also common after 1700; in senses 3, 4 chamæleon is now frequent.]

1. A saurian reptile of the genus Chamæleo, family Chamæleonidæ, small lizard-like creatures, distinguished by a prehensile tail, long tongue, eyes moving independently, and covered each with a single circular eyelid, but esp. by their power of changing the colour of the skin, 'varying through different shades of yellow, red, gray, brown, and dull inky blue' (Carpenter Zoology 1847). From their inanimate appearance, and power of existing for long periods without food, they were formerly supposed to live on air. These attributes made the name famous and familiar to many who knew nothing else of the animal.

Chamfer (tʃæ·mfəɹ), sb. Also 7 chamfre. [app. ad. F. chanfrein, formerly also chamfrain, chanfrain, -frin, 'a chanfering or a channel, furrow, hollow gutter, or streake in stone-worke, etc.' (Cotgr.), f. OF. chanfraindre to CHAMFER. It is possible that the Fr. chamfrain directly gave the Eng. CHAMFERING, and that from this, taken as a vbl. sb., chamfer vb. and sb. were educed.

The connexion of the two senses is unexplained; sense 1 appears to be the earlier (cf. the vb. and derivatives).

(Gwilt, Archit. 928, cites sense 2 from a MS. of 1475, but apparently in error.)]

†1. A small groove, channel, gutter, furrow, such as may be cut in wood or stone. Obs.

Chamois (ʃæ·moi, ʃæ·mi, ‖ ʃamwā). Forms: see below. [a. F. chamois (16th c. in Littré), prob. from Swiss Romanic: in Tyrolese camozza, camozz, Piedm. camossa, camoss, mod.Pr. camous, Rumansch camuotsch, chamotsch (Diez); It. camozza, camoscio (cf. camoscia chamois leather); Sp. camuza, gamuza, Pg. camuça, camurça. Presumably of the same origin as OHG. and MHG. gamz, mod.G. gemse; but the relations between the Teutonic and Romanic words have not been ascertained, and no etymology is known either in Latin or Teutonic. See Diez, Littré, Kluge.

The English form chamoy, chamoi, was doubtless partly at least due to the final -s being taken as a plural ending. The name of the animal is now always written chamois; but sense 2 is still frequently shammy and shamoy.]

1. (Forms: 6 shamoye, 7 shamois(e, shammois, 7-8 shamoys, 8 shammoy, chamoi. 6- chamois.) A capriform antelope (A. rupicapra or Rupicapra tragus), the only representative of the antelopes found wild in Europe; it inhabits the loftiest parts of the Alps, Pyrenees, Taurus, and other mountain ranges of Europe and Asia.

Its size is that of a full-grown goat; it is covered with brown hair, and has horns, about six inches long, which rise straight above the head, bending back so as to form complete hooks. Its agility and keenness of scent make its chase most difficult and exciting. (The 'chamois' of the English Bible is probably a moufflon.)

Champ (tʃæmp), v. Also 6 chaump, 6-7 champe, 7 and 9 dial. chomp. [Only since 16th c. Cham (chawm, chamb), champ, and the dial. chamble (Halliwell), appear all to belong to a primary chamb, app. closely connected or identical with JAM (jamb), and jamble, to squeeze with violence, crush. The group is not distinctly traceable outside English: the Sw. dial. kämsa (tʃemsa) to chew with difficulty (Rietz in Skeat), Skr. jambha jaw, tooth, and Gr. γομφίος grinder, molar tooth, have been compared; but links are wanting. Possibly the group is an instance of recent onomatopœia: Wedgwood gives instances showing that cham(b), jam(b), are natural representations of the action or sound of the jaws in diverse and distant languages.

An ON. kampa 'to devour, used of a whiskered animal' (Vigf.) would not give Eng. champ; E. Müller's suggestion of derivation from F. champ field is devoid of basis.]

OF. champaigne (= It. campagna, Sp. campaña, Pg. campanha): — L. campānia 'plain, level country', spec. the name of the rich and level province of Italy lying south-west of the Tiber, afterwards specially distinguished as Campagna de Roma; in later Latin (e.g. by Gregory of Tours, c 575) applied to many similar tracts, and as a common noun; f. camp-us level field.

Taken into Eng. not in the Norman or North Fr. form campaigne, but in that of central Fr. The pronunciation with tʃ- and stress on first syllable is exemplified already in 14th c. in alliterative verse. The same accentuation is shown by all English poets from Shakspere to Tennyson and Browning; but occasional instances with the stress on the second syllable appear in the 19th c., and some even identify the word in pronunciation with champagne, as if it were from modern French. Webster and Worcester have this pronunciation only.

In the 16th c. there arose a variant champion, CHAMPIAN, which in the 17th c. was much more frequent than the normal form. In the 17th c. the mod. F. form campagne was introduced, and was at length established in a differentiated military sense: see CAMPAIGN.]

OF. cancelier, chancelier :—L. cancellārius usher of a law court, whose station was ad cancellos at the bars or grating which separated the public from the judges (see CANCELLI, CHANCEL). The word appeared already in late OE. as canceler (occas. cancheler), evidently introduced by Edward the Confessor from Norman French cancheler; this was in 13th c. supplanted by the Central Fr. form chanceler; and this in late Anglo-Fr., and thence in 16th c. English, was erroneously spelt -our, -or, like other words properly in -er, -re, etc.: cf. ANCESTOR, and see -OR.]

[The early history of the sense lies outside English: in the Roman Empire, the cancellarius was a petty officer stationed at the bar (of lattice work) in a basilica or other law court (cf. CANCELLI, CHANCEL), as usher of the court; in the Eastern Empire he had risen to be a secretary or notary, who in later times was invested also with judicial functions. From the ancient Roman Empire, the name and office was transferred to the Western Empire, and Kingdoms, with a varying but generally increasing importance. It appears to have been introduced into England by Edward the Confessor, and became an important office under the Norman Kings, the chancellor as official secretary having superintendence of all charters, letters, and official writings of the sovereign, the custody of the royal seals, and important legal functions; see senses 1 a, 2 a. From the Roman Empire the office also passed into the church (whence sense 5), and into the mediæval orders of knighthood (whence 6 b).

I. 1. General sense of secretary, official secretary. Obs. or alien. † a. of the king of England. Obs.

This office has developed into that described in 2 a, and for the sake of historical continuity the quotations are all given there, but the earliest also belong here, and the phrase the King's Chancellor continued in occasional use down to the 16th c.

II. Modern uses of the title arising out of the original sense:

2. a. Chancellor of England, also called Lord Chancellor, and Lord High Chancellor: the same officer who was originally the King's Chancellor (see 1 a), who has in course of time become the highest officer of the crown, and an important member of the cabinet.

He is the highest judicial functionary in the kingdom, and ranks above all peers spiritual and temporal, except only princes of the blood, and the archbishop of Canterbury; he is keeper of the Great Seal, is styled 'Keeper of his Majesty's conscience', and is president and prolocutor of the House of Lords; he presides in what was the Court of Chancery, but is now the Chancery Division of the Supreme Court; appoints all justices of peace; is the general guardian of infants, lunatics, and idiots; is visitor of hospitals and colleges of royal foundation, and patron of all church livings under twenty marks in value.

2. The court of the Lord Chancellor of England, the highest court of judicature next to the House of Lords; but, since the Judicature Act of 1873, a division of the High Court of Justice.

It formerly consisted of two distinct tribunals, one ordinary, being a court of common law, the other extraordinary, being a court of equity. To the former belonged the issuing of writs for a new parliament, and of all original writs. The second proceeded upon rules of equity and conscience, moderating the rigour of the common law, and giving relief in cases where there was no remedy in the common-law courts. Its functions in this respect are now transferred to the Court of Appeal.

In Ireland the Court of Chancery was distinct from, but analogous in character to, the English court; but it has been similarly changed into a division of the Irish High Court of Justice.

b. Applied to similar courts elsewhere; in U.S. 'a court of equity' (Webster).

'In imitation of the High Court of Chancery in England, various local courts of equity have sprung up in the British dominions and dependencies. Some of these are called Courts of Chancery.. In each of the counties palatine of Lancaster and Durham, and in Ireland, there is a court so named, which dispenses the same equity within the limits of its jurisdiction, as the High Court of Chancery.' Penny Cycl. s. v.

In others .. the courts that administer equity are distinct tribunals, having their appropriate judicial officers, and it is to the latter, that the appellation courts of chancery is usually applied; but in American Law, the terms equity and courts of equity are more frequently employed.

c. Scotland. An office in the General Register House, Edinburgh (formerly called CHANCELLARY, q.v.), in which is kept a record of all writs relative to crown lands; also of crown charters of incorporation; commissions or gifts of office from the crown; service of heirs, general and special; and all writs appointed to pass the great or the quarter seal. From it are issued, in the sovereign's name, brieves of inquest regarding idiotcy or insanity, and letters of tutory and curatory.

(Established by James I on his return from his English captivity 1424, and apparently intended to be a court on the model of the English Chancery. But it was never completely organized, and after the complete establishment of the Court of Session (1532), the Chancery office was reduced practically to the function of issuing certain brieves, and recording certain writs. Cf. sense 3.)

2. Music. A short melody or phrase to which the Psalms, Canticles, etc., are sung in public worship.

The essential characteristic of a chant is the long 'reciting-note' to which an indefinite number of syllables are sung, followed by a rhythmical cadence. The modern Anglican chant (derived from the old Gregorian) is either single or double. A single chant is sung to one verse of a psalm, and consists of two strains, of 3 and 4 bars respectively, each beginning with a reciting-note. A double chant has twice the length of a single one, and is sung to two verses.

2. The metal plate or mounting of a scabbard or sheath; particularly that which covers the point. In some early quots. it may mean the scabbard or sheath itself.

The following explanations also occur in Dicts.; 'The transverse guard of a sword for a protection to the hand' (Fairholt, cited by Ogilvie). Johnson says 'the catch of any thing by which it is held in its place; as the hook of a scabbard by which it sticks in the belt; the point by which a buckle is held to the back strap' [citing All's Well 'the chape of his dagger']. But here the chape of a dagger appears to be confused with that of a buckle.

Chapel (tʃæ·pĕl), sb. Forms: 3–4 chapele, 4–6 -elle, 4–7 -ell, 3– chapel; also 4 chapaile, 5 -ylle, schapell(e, 6 chappelle, -ylle, capell, cappell, 6–8 chappel(l. [ME. chapele, a. OF. chapele (in ONF. capele, Pr. capella, It. cappella) :—late L. cappella, orig. little cloak or cape, dim. of cappa, cloak, cape, cope (see CAP). From the cappella or cloak of St. Martin, preserved by the Frankish kings as a sacred relic, which was borne before them in battle, and used to give sanctity to oaths, the name was applied to the sanctuary in which this was preserved under the care of its cappellani or 'chaplains', and thence generally to a sanctuary containing holy relics, attached to a palace, etc., and so to any private sanctuary or holy place, and finally to any apartment or building for orisons or worship, not being a church, the earlier name for which was Oratorium, ORATORY.

The chief data for the history are: the Monk of St. Gall (Vita Car. Magn. i. 4) 'Quo nomine Francorum reges propter capam St. Martini sancta sua appellare solebant'; a charter of Childebert A. D. 710 (Mabillon De Re Dipl.) containing 'in oratorio suo seu capella S. Marthini'. In the capitularies of Charles the Great (cap. v. 182) c. 800 it is used of chapels in or attached to palaces; the Laws of the Lombards (III. iii. 22) have 'ecclesiae et capellæ quæ in vestra parochia sunt'.

Cappella was generally spelt capella in med.L.; the true form is evidenced not only by It. cappella, but even more by the persistence of -ap- in Fr. and of -p- in the other langs. Capella would have become in F. chevelle; as capillos, caprum, capistrum become cheveux, chevre, chevêtre.]

1. gen. A sanctuary or place of Christian worship, not the church of a parish or the cathedral church of a diocese; an oratory. (In earlier times always consecrated, and having an altar; in modern use not necessarily so.)

b. Parochial chapel: the place of worship of an ancient division of a parish attached to it by custom and repute, as e.g. in the case of the numerous divisions of the parish of Kendal, and other large parishes of the Lake district; District chapel, that of a modern 'district' or division of a parish constituted under the Church Building Acts, from 59 Geo. III, c. 134, onwards. To both of these the name CHURCH is now commonly given, except in remote districts or special instances.

Law* II. 1824 A parochial chapel is that which has the parochial rights of christening and burying; and this differs in nothing from a church, but in the want of a rectory and endowment

c. Free chapel: a chapel not subject to the jurisdiction of the ordinary, having been founded by the king or by a subject specially authorized by him.

1523 Act 14 & 15 Hen. VIII, c. 9 The Deane and Chapiter ..of the free chapell of the kynge, of Sainct Martins le graunde. 1545 Act 37 Hen. Law II. 1824 The king himself visits his free chapels ..and not the ordinary.

d. Proprietary chapel: one that is the property of private persons.

1873 PHILLIMORE Eccl. Law II. 1183 Proprietary chapels .. are anomalies unknown to the ecclesiastical constitution of this kingdom, and can possess no parochial rights .. Dr. Lushington said..the ancient canon law of this country knew nothing of proprietary chapels or unconsecrated chapels at all..The necessity of the times..gave rise to the erection of chapels of this kind, and to the licensing of ministers of the Church of England to perform duty therein. Ibid. II. 1834 It is at any time competent to the proprietors of an unconsecrated chapel to convert it to secular purposes.

4. Applied to places of Christian worship other than those of the established church of the country: e.g. to those of Roman Catholics in Great Britain and Ireland, and of the Episcopal Church in Scotland; of the Nonconformists ejected in 1662; of Methodists since the 18th c., and, recently, of Protestant Dissenters generally (in England and Wales).

These uses go back to a time when 'church' had still its historical value of the endowed place of worship of a parish, with its beneficed rector or vicar, tithes, etc., and when no other place of worship, whatever its architecture, ritual, or communion, was thought of as the 'church'. Of R. C. chapels the earliest mentioned were those of foreign ambassadors, and Roman Catholic queens of the Stuarts (see sense 2 a); in the 18th c., and down to 1830–40, 'chapel' was the regular name, as it is still in Ireland. The name first used by Protestants separating from the Church of England was app. 'meeting-house'; but the places of worship founded by the non-conforming clergymen ejected in 1662 were commonly 'chapels'; after that, 'meeting-house' and 'chapel' were used more or less synonymously by Protestant Dissenters; the former became the prevailing name in the 18th c., but was mostly abandoned for 'chapel' in the first half of the 19th c. (except by Quakers). For his connexion, Wesley introduced 'preaching-house'; but Methodist Churchmen appear to have preferred 'chapel'; and it was in the sequel often used by Wesley as = 'preaching-house', and gradually took its place. During the present century, the custom of applying 'church' to the parochial and district chapels of the Church of England, has been followed by the use of 'church' for 'chapel' by Roman Catholics, Scotch Episcopalians, and many Nonconformists. (See CHURCH.) But the earlier usage has made chapel in Ireland the common appellation of the R. C. places of worship and service, as distinguished from those of the Protestant (Episcopal) Church; and in England and Wales of nonconformist places of worship or service, as distinguished from those of the Church of England. Hence such combinations as chapel-goer, chapel-going, chapel-people, etc.

4. A duly constituted general meeting or assembly of the canons of a collegiate or cathedral church, of the members of any monastic or religious order, or of an order of knights, for consultation and transaction of the affairs of their order.)

['From the last-mentioned usage (the capitula of a monastic rule) coupled with the practice of reading a capitulum or chapter of the Rule, or (as was St. Augustine's practice) of the Scriptures, to the assembled canons or monks, the assembled canons or monks themselves came to be called in a body the capitulum or chapter, and their meeting-place the chapter-house.' Dict. Chr. Antiq. I. 288/1; cf. Du Cange and Littré. More exactly the name chapter was first transferred to the meeting, and then to those who met. The transference was easy through such expressions as ire or convenire ad capitulum, to go to (the reading of) the capitle or chapter, thus to the meeting.]

[The first element is of uncertain origin; from the earliest instances it appears to be char; charke, cherke, found from beg. of 16th c., being app. due to erroneous analysis of the spoken word, and having no independent origin or meaning, though afterwards (in 17th c.) used as an independent word. A current suggestion is that char- is an application of CHARE v. or sb.[1], as if turn-coal, i. e. wood turned or converted into coal; but for this no actual evidence has been found.

The name 'coal' itself originally meant 'charcoal' (collier being a 'charcoal-burner'), and no satisfactory explanation appears of the introduction of the name charcoal in the same sense, esp. as there is no contemporary reference to 'earth-coal', 'stone-coal', 'pit-coal', or 'sea-coal' (as mineral coal was, for various reasons, called). See COAL.]

Charge (tʃāɪdʒ), v. Forms: 3– charge; also 4 cherge, scharge, 5 charg, 6– Sc. chairge. [a. OF. charge-r, -ier, 11th c. in Littré (= ONF. cargier, cargier, Pr. cargar, Sp., Pg. cargar, It. caricare):—L. carricāre (in Jerome) to load, f. carr-us car, wagon: cf. communicāre to share in common, caballicāre to ride, etc.

(Several forms resulted in Romanic from the L. type carricāre. When the original vb. in sense 'load' was syncopated at an early period to carcāre (cf. It. caricare, carcare), this gave OF. karkier, charchier (cf. L. caballus horse, caballicāre, cabalcāre to ride, F. chevaucher); thence ME. Cark and Charche. Otherwise, carricāre became carrigāre, and was then syncopated to cargare, OF. cargier, chargier, Eng. Charge. After these changes had taken place, and the original verb had become Romanic carcare, cargare, a new carricāre was formed in the sense 'to convey in a car', 'to cart', and this gave OF. careyer, carier, charier (cf. manus hand, manicāre to handle, F. manier); thence Eng. Carry.)]

I. To load; to cause to bear, hold, or receive.

Charity (tʃæ·rĭti). Forms: α. 2 carited, kariteþ, -teð; β. 2–6 charite, cherite, 4–5 cheryte, 4–6 charyte, charitee, 4–7 charitie, 4– charity. [Two early types of this word appear in Eng.: (1) caritēð, -teþ, (2) charité; these are adoptions respectively of ONF. caritedh, -tet(þ), (later, and mod.Pic. carité), and the somewhat later central OF. charité (earlier charitet); which correspond to Pr. caritat, Sp. caridad, It. carità, semi-popular adaptations of L. cāritāt-em in its theological sense. In truly popular use L. cāritāt-em had already become, through pop. Lat. cartāt-em,* Pr. cartat, ONF. kierté, OF. chierté, mod.F. cherté. But this had the general Latin senses of 'dearness (high price), fondness, affection', as well as those belonging specially to New Testament and Christian use; subsequently, to indicate the latter more distinctly, the Latin word, familiar in the language of the church, passed anew into popular use, and undergoing (from its later date) less phonetic change, gave caritat, caritet, charitet, charité. Mixture of the two forms gave the type cherité, and, in Eng. at least, the two words were not kept altogether distinct in use. See CHERTE.

The Greek word for 'love' in the N. T. (occasionally also in LXX) is ἀγάπη, from root of vb. ἀγαπά-ειν 'to treat with affectionate regard', 'to love'; in the Vulgate, ἀγάπη is sometimes rendered by dilectio (noun of action f. diligere to esteem highly, love), but most frequently by caritas, 'dearness, love founded on esteem' (never by amōr). Wyclif and the Rhemish version regularly rendered the Vulgate dilectio by 'love', caritas by 'charity'. But the 16th c. Eng. versions from Tindale to 1611, while rendering ἀγάπη sometimes 'love', sometimes 'charity', did not follow the dilectio and caritas of the Vulgate, but used 'love' more often (about 86 times), confining 'charity' to 26 passages in the Pauline and certain of the Catholic Epistles (not in 1 John), and the Apocalypse, where the sense is specifically 1c. below. In the Revised Version 1881, 'love' has been substituted in all these instances, so that it now stands as the uniform rendering of ἀγάπη, to the elimination of the distinction of dilectio and caritas introduced by the Vulgate, and of 'love' and 'charity' of the 16th c. versions.]

[OE. Carles wægn the wain (ἅμαξα, plaustrum) of Carl (Charles the Great, Charlemagne). The name appears to arise out of the verbal association of the star-name Arcturus with Arturus or Arthur, and the legendary association of Arthur and Charlemagne; so that what was originally the wain of Arcturus or Boötes ('Boötes' golden wain' Pope), became at length the wain of Carl or Charlemagne. (The guess churl's or carle's wain has been made in ignorance of the history.)]

The asterism comprising the seven bright stars in Ursa Major; known also as The Plough.

As the name Arcturus was formerly sometimes applied loosely to the constellation Boötes and incorrectly to the Great Bear, the name Carlewayne-sterre occurs applied to the star Arcturus.

Charterhouse (tʃā·ɹtəɹhɑus). Also (in sense 3) 7 chartrous. [An alteration, by popular etymology, of AF. chartrouse = F. chartreuse, i.e. maison chartreuse Carthusian house. (But, in sense 3 really corresp. to the masc. F. chartreux, AF. chartrous, which is preserved in quot. 1641.) OF. chartreus, -euse (AF. -ous, -ouse) was itself a corruption of an earlier form charteus, -euse (AF. chartous, charthous, -ouse, cf. It. certosa) repr. L. cartusius, carthusius: see CARTHUSIAN. This earlier form was also used in Eng. as chartous, CHARTHOUS, q. v.

The popular understanding of chartrouse as chart(e)r-(h)ouse, was of course helped by the fact that the meaning was Carthusian 'house', maison chartreuse. The earlier corruption of charteus, -ous to chartreus, -rous, was app. one of French popular etymology, and probably due to association with chartre prison, suggested by the rigid confinement and severe discipline of the order.]

Gaz.* 3 Feb., Firing at each other their bow and stern chases.

7. Tennis. Applied to the second impact on the floor (or in a gallery) of a ball which the opponent has failed or declined to return; the value of which is determined by the nearness of the spot of impact to the end wall. If the opponent, on sides being changed (see quot. 1653), can 'better' this stroke (i. e. cause his ball to rebound nearer the wall) he wins and scores it; if not, it is scored by the first player; until it is so decided, the 'chase' is a stroke in abeyance.

Since the distance of the place of impact from the wall is the point of value, the common explanation in Dictionaries is 'The place where the ball completes its first bound'.

The OF. vb. was adopted in 12th c. Eng. as chastien: in early southern Eng., where the OE. weak verbs in -igan still retained -ien in the infinitive, as OE. lufigan (3rd s. lufað), ME. luvien (3rd s. luveth), later luvi, luvy, luv-en, luv-e, the -ien of chastien was apparently treated in the same way, giving chast-y, chast-en, chast-e. But in those dialects in which lufigan was already reduced to luv-en, chasti- was recognized as the stem of chasti-en, and gave later chasty-e, chasty. Hence in 13th and early 14th c., chasti is the infinitive of chaste, or the stem of chasty, according to dialect.]

[An equivalent of the earlier CHASTE and CHASTY, the formation of which is not easily accounted for. There is no recorded med.L. castizāre, F. chastiser, and no OF. chastir, chastiss-, the usual sources of -ise, -ize in English verbs; the word is too early to be a simple English formation from CHASTE a. + -IZE. The stress was originally always on the first syllable cha·stise, is generally so with Shakspere (7 times against 2), and also in later poets, as still in cha·stisement; but already in Chaucer sometimes, and Gower often, on the second, as now.

If chastise was in some way altered from chasty, the alteration has not been accounted for. If the sb. chastice had been more frequent or of earlier date in the language, it might have been suggested that the verb was formed on it.]

Chasuble (tʃæ·ziɪb'l). Forms: 4-6 chesible; also 4 -eble, cheisible, 4-5 chesyble, 5 -sibil, -ciple, -siple, -sypyl, -ylle, 5-6 chesybyll, 6 chisible; 5 chesabyll, -pyll, 6 chesable, -sabell; 5 chesuble, chezuble, 6 cheasuble, 7- chasuble. [ME. chesible was a. OF. chesible (cf. med.L. cassibula); the current form, which has taken its place since 1700, corresponds to mod.F. chasuble (casuble 13th c. in Littré), and to the med.L. casubula (cassubila, casubla, etc.); these go back respectively to late L. types casipula*, casupula* (in It. casipola and casupola: little house, poor cottage, cot, hut), popular forms used instead of the literary L. casula, dim. of casa 'cottage, house'; meaning originally 'little house, cot', but also, already in Augustine (c 400), the ordinary name of an outer garment, a large round sleeveless cloak with a hood, according to Isidore (XIX. xxi. 17) 'vestis cucullata, dicta per diminutionem a casa, quod totum hominem tegat, quasi minor casa'.

(Casipula from casa has been compared to manipulus 'little band' from manus. The literary casula appears to have left no representative in mod. Romanic langs.; the OF. chasule, casule (casure), Sp. casulla, point to the secondary diminutive casulula (see Du Cange).

As an article of dress, casula appears to have been a popular or provincial name for the pænula of classical Latin, a garment consisting of a circular piece of cloth with a hole in the centre for the head, worn in cold or rainy weather, by peasants in the fields, travellers, etc.; as the most ordinary of garments, it was worn by the monks, and by the Council of Ratisbon, 742, was decreed to be the proper dress of the clergy out of doors. For the supervestment worn in sacerdotal offices, the ordinary name from 5th to 8th c. was planeta; 'the earliest undoubted instance of casula so used (in Sacramentary of St. Gregory) dates from the 9th c., or possibly the 8th' (Dict. Chr. Ant.). But it at length supplanted the earlier names planeta, amphibolum, infula; and in English chasuble has this sense only.]

1. An ecclesiastical vestment, a kind of sleeveless mantle covering the body and shoulders, worn over the alb and stole by the celebrant at Mass or the Eucharist.

‖ Chauvin (ʃōvęn). [F.; from the surname of a veteran soldier of the First Republic and Empire, Nicolas Chauvin of Rochefort, whose demonstrative patriotism and loyalty were celebrated, and at length ridiculed, by his comrades. After the fall of Napoleon, applied in ridicule to old soldiers of the Empire, who professed a sort of idolatrous admiration for his person and acts. Especially popularized as the name of one of the characters in Cogniard's famous vaudeville, La Cocarde Tricolore, 1831 ('je suis français, je suis Chauvin'); and now applied to any one smitten with an absurd patriotism, and enthusiasm for national glory and military ascendancy. Hence, Chauvinism (ʃō·viniz'm). [a. F. chauvinisme, orig. 'idolatrie napoléonienne' La Rousse.] Exaggerated patriotism of a bellicose sort; blind enthusiasm for national glory or military ascendancy; the French quality which finds its parallel in British 'Jingoism'.

Chaw (tʃǭ), v. (now vulgar). Also 6–7 chawe. [A by-form of CHEW (OE. cēowan), found since 16th c. The form is not easily accounted for, but it agrees with mod.Du. kauwen, Ger. kauen, LG. kauen, kawen, as distinct from MHG. kiuwen, OHG. chiuwan, MDu. kuwen; and it is not far phonetically from another variant chow, chowe, used in Eng. in 16th c., and now in Sc. and some Eng. dialects; see CHOW. Chaw was very common in 16–17th c.; it occurs in Udall, Bradford, Levins, Golding, Marbeck, Baret, Breton, Drayton, Marston, Dekker, Topsell, Donne, Ben Jonson, Markham, Boyle, Fuller, Cogan, Harris, etc. in addition to the authors cited below. It is now esteemed vulgar, and is used of coarse or vulgar actions, as 'chawing' tobacco.

(A suggested explanation of the form is a possible passing of the OE. cēowan, cēaw, cuwon, cowen, into another conjugation, as ceawan, cēow, ceawen; but as no trace of the chaw form occurs before 1530, this seems unhistorical.)]

[A common Teut. sb.: OE. cēap 'barter, buying and selling, market, price, merchandise, stock, cattle', = OFris. kāp, OS. kōp (MDu. coop, Du. koop, LG. koop), OHG. chouf, MHG. kouf trade, buying and selling, merchandise, gain, payment (Ger. kauf purchase):—WGer. kaup*:—OTeut. kaupo-z* masc.; cf. ON. kaup bargain, pay, wages (Sw. köp, Da. kjöb bargain, purchase, price), neut. :—kaupo*ᵐ. The original sense was 'bargaining, barter, exchange of commodities', whence, after the use of money, 'buying and selling', 'buying or selling', in later times often restricted to 'buying, purchase' alone. Beside it, the Teut. langs. have the derivative verbs, kaupjan* (OHG. chouffen, OE. cēpan), and kaupôjan* (Goth. kaupon, OHG. chouffôn, OE. cēapian) to barter, buy and sell, etc. (see CHEAP v.), and OHG. an agent-sb. choufo, WGer. type kaupo, -on*, trader, merchant. OE. is the only language in which the sb. has the sense 'cattle', so that there is no ground for taking that as the original sense; it was either, like the word CATTLE itself, a special application of the general sense 'merchandise, stock', or perhaps connected with the use of cattle as a medium of exchange or measure of value; cf. FEE.

The coincidence of the stem kaup-, and esp. the identity of the WGer. agent-sb. kaupo, -on* 'trader, merchant, dealer', with L. caupo, -ōn-em 'petty tradesman, huckster, tavern keeper', has suggested that the Teut. word and its family are of Latin origin. But there are serious difficulties. Some, taking the Goth. vb. kaupatjan 'to cuff' as a deriv. of the same root, suggest for kaup- the original sense of 'stroke, striking': compare the notion of 'striking' a bargain, 'striking hands' over a bargain, Ger. handschlag.]

I. As a simple sb.

1. A bargain about the bartering or exchanging of one commodity for another, or of giving money or the like for any commodity; bargaining, trade, buying and selling.

Check (tʃek), int. & sb. Forms: 4-6 chek, (4 cheke, cheekke, 4-5 chekke, 5 chicke, chak), 6-9 checque, 7-9 cheque, (7 cheeque), 4– check. [ME. chek, chak, aphetic f. eschek, -chak*, a. OF. eschec, -ek, -eq, eschac, in ONF. eskec, eseac, Pr. escac, It. scacco 'check' in chess, med. L. scaccus, scācus; cf. also the parallel forms Sp. jaque, OSP. xaque 'check', Pg. xaque 'check' and 'shah' (of Persia). Adapted form (immed. from Arabic) of Pers. شاه shāh 'king', also the 'King' in chess; in this specific sense the Pers. word was taken into Arabic, where arose the phrase شاه مات shāh māt(a, 'the King is dead', i.e. can make no further move: see CHECKMATE. (This has been taken back into Persian in the form shāh māt gardad = the shāh becomes māt.) In a MS. written in Sevilla in 1283, shāh is made in OSp. xaque (x = sh), and shāh māt(a appears as xaque mate. But the adoption of the words in Romanic took place some centuries earlier, the common Romanic form taken by shāh being scāc-, scacc-, as in the med.L., It., Pr., and Fr. forms given above. Thence also the MHG. schāch, Ger. schach, Du. skaak, Icel. skák, Da. skak, Sw. schack 'check' and 'chess' (in the latter sense also schach-spiel, skaakspel, etc. = check-play). The general meaning in Romanic is 'check'; for the name of the game the plural is used in med.L. scacci, It. scacchi, Pr. escacos, F. échecs: see CHESS.

From its use in chess the word has been widely transferred in French and English. In the sense-extension the sb. and vb. have acted and reacted on each other, so that it is difficult to trace and exhibit the order in which special senses arose.]

L. camisia appears first in Jerome c 400 (Ep. Vest. Mul. 64 n. 11 'volo pro legentis facilitate abuti sermone vulgato; solent militantes habere lineas, quas camisias vocant'). It is also in Salic Law (lviii. 4 camisia, and camisa), Isidore (XIX. xxi. 1, xxii. 29 'Camisias (v. r. camisas) vocari, quod in his dormimus in camis, id est stratis nostris'). Beside it is found the deriv. camisīle, -is, campsīle, OF. cainsil, chainsil fine linen, alb, etc. (see CHAISEL); also an uncertainly related camix, It. camice, OF. cainse, chainse, 'alb'.

The ulterior history and origin of camisia are uncertain. German etymologists incline to consider it adopted from Teutonic, and related to OE. ham shirt, and Ger. hemd, OHG. hemidi, Gothic type hamiþi,* f. root ham to cover, clothe. Kluge supposes a derivative hamisjâ-*, which, if it existed, might perh. give a Romanic camisia, as German h gave c in OFrench, through Frankish ch. But besides other difficulties, no traces of the required word are actually found in any Teutonic lang., the nearest thing being ON. hams masc. (:–hamiso-z) snake's slough. The Irish caimmse, Cornish cams, Bret. kamps an alb, and MCorn. camse an article of female clothing, are all adopted from L. or French.]

1. A garment: the name has been variously applied at different times; perh. originally (as still in French and other Romanic languages) the undergarment, usually of linen, both of men and women, a shirt; but now restricted to that worn by females, formerly called 'smock' and 'shift'. †Formerly also applied to some under garment distinct from the 'smock', as well as to a priest's alb or surplice (so med.L. camisa), the robe of a herald, etc.

4. popularly and commercially. One who deals in medicinal drugs. (Not in U.S.; in Scotland also, druggist is the ordinary term.)

In Great Britain, the use of the terms chemist-and-druggist and pharmaceutical chemist is now regulated by the Pharmacy Acts of 1852, 1868, 1869; a pharmaceutical chemist (pharmaceutist, pharmacist) is a person who has passed the higher examination of the Pharmaceutical Society, which qualifies for membership, under the provisions of section 10 of the act of 1852; a chemist and druggist is a person who has passed the minor examination under the provisions of section 6 of the act of 1868, or who was actually in business when the act of 1868 was passed. No other person than these is legally entitled to use the name chemist (or druggist) in any connexion for trading purposes.

3. That branch of physical science and research, which deals with the several elementary substances, or forms of matter, of which all bodies are composed, the laws that regulate the combination of these elements in the formation of compound bodies, and the various phenomena that accompany their exposure to diverse physical conditions.

Chemistry is thus at once a science and an art; the latter, called applied or practical chemistry, is that referred to by the earlier authors and explained in early dictionaries.

a. as an art or process.

Cheque, check (tʃek): Banking. [Cheque is a differentiated spelling of check, which is also in use, especially in U.S. In meaning it belongs to CHECK sb.^{1} sense 13. Cf. also CHECK v.^{1} sense 16. From being the name of the counterfoil of an Exchequer or other bill, the purpose of which was to check forgery or alteration, the name appears to have been applied to any bill, note, or draft, having a counterfoil, and thus to its present sense, where a counterfoil (though usual) is not even necessary.]

† 1. The counterfoil of a bank bill, draft, etc. Obs.

1706 Act 5 Anne c. 13 [Enacts that Exchequer Bills be made henceforth with two counterfoils instead of one, and] That the said Governor and Company [of Bk. of Eng.] shall .. have the use and custody of the one part of all and euery the Checques, Indents, or Counterfoyls of all such Exchequer Bills .. and from which the same Exchequer Bills shall be cut. 1708 Act 7 Anne c. 7 Such part of the said Cheques, Indents, or Counterfoils as shall relate to the Bills so discharged or cancelled..shall be delivered back into the Receipt of Her Majesties Exchequer by the said Governor and Company. [Cf. Mr. A. W. Chisholm's Return to Ho. of Commons, ordered 11 May 1857, on National Debt.] 1755 JOHNSON, Check, the correspondent cipher of a bank bill. 1774–82 BARCLAY Dict., Check .. a counter-cypher of a bank bill; an account kept privately to examine that which is kept with a banker, or public office.

Hence Checque-note, a 'note' having a counterfoil.

2. A draft form having a counterfoil. Obs.

1717 Minutes of Court of Bank of Eng. 24 Oct., Ordered..that Mr. Woolhead desire all persons who keep accounts by Drawn Notes to use cheques, who do not at present. 1765 Ibid. 19 Dec., Ordered that no cheques be delivered but to Persons keeping Cash with the Bank, or to their order in writing, or to their known servant, bringing with him the Bank Book; and that the servant be desired to write his Master's name and his own in a leaf of the Cheque Book, against the number of cheques delivered him, and that the Bank Officer do write the number of the said cheques with the day when delivered signed with his own name in a spare leafe of their Bank Books .. That the name and place of abode of every person demanding payment of Bank Draughts be wrote on the Back thereof before the Draughts be paid. 1832 in Lawson Hist. Banking (1850) 186 Cheques are given out in books, and not in sheets as heretofore.

This was apparently the sense in which Tucker used checked paper (which could not mean chequered or patterned paper, as none such was ever used by the Bank of Eng.):

1765 Tucker Lt. Nat. I. Gen. Good, If I have an account with the Bank of England, and .. should I chance on some distant journey to be reduced low in pocket, if I have no checked paper along with me, I cannot draw for a single sixpence.

8. A written order (on a printed form or otherwise) to a banker by a person having money in the banker's hands, directing him to pay, on presentation, to bearer or to a person named the sum of money stated therein (called in Bank of England books 1717 a Drawn Note.) Blank cheque: (usually) a cheque signed by the drawer, but with the amount left blank to be filled up by the person to whom it is given.

Quot. 1774 may possibly belong to 1, or 2.

II. The Exchequer.

Of the origin of this application of the word various more or less conjectural explanations have been offered: the earliest is that given in the Dialogus de Scaccario or Dialogue concerning the Exchequer, written in 1178 'by Richard Bishop of London the Treasurer, son of Bishop Nigel the Treasurer, and great-nephew of the justiciar Roger of Salisbury' (Stubbs). According to this the scaccarium (chequer or eschequier) of the King was a quadrangular table, covered with a black cloth marked with transverse lines a foot or a palm apart, and having 'calculi' in the spaces; it was presumed to be so called from its likeness to a chequer or chess-board.

†5. The table which gave its name to the King's Exchequer; any table for accounts, a counter. Obs.

1178 Dial. de Scaccario in Madox Exchequer App., Scaccarium tabula est quadrangula. Cherry (tʃe·ri), sb. Forms: α. 1 cyrs, ciris; β. 4 chiri(e, 4–7 chery(e, 5 cheri, chere, cherree, chiry, 6 chirrie, (cheryse), 6–7 cherie, cherrie, 6– cherry. [The OE. name ciris, cyrs (known only in comb.) was cogn. with OHG. chirsa, chersa (MHG. kirse, kerse, mod.G. kirsche), OLG. kirsa* (MDu. kerse, Du. kers, Fl. keerze), all repr. earlier (? WGer.) kirissa*:—keresjâ*, adoption of a pop. L. ceresia*, ceresea*, which was also the progenitor of the Romanic forms It. ciriegia, Sp. cereza, Pg. cereja, Pr. cereisa, cereira, F. cerise (cf. med.L. ciresum). The ME. chery, chiri is not known till 14th c.; it was probably derived from ONF. cherise (still used in Northern France), inferred to have given an early ME. cherise, cheris, which was subseq. mistaken for a plural in -s, and a singular cheri educed from it: cf. pea, chay, riches. It is hardly possible that the OE. ciris itself gave the ME. word.

Classical L. had cerasus cherry-tree, cerasum cherry, corresp. to Gr. κερασός (also κερασέα, κερασία) cherry-tree, κεράσιον cherry; according to the Roman writers, so called because brought by Lucullus from Cerasus in Pontus (though some refer the Gr. to κέρας, horn). L. Cerasea*, to which the Romanic and Teutonic names alike go back, was prob. an adj. form: its phonology is not evidenced; perh. there was a popular cerĕsus* for cerāsus, whence cereseus* for ceraseus. The sequence of forms in WGer. was app. keresja, kerisja, kirisja, kirissa, whence OE. cirisse, ciris, cirs. All the Celtic names are either from Romanic, as Breton qeres (Rostrennen) keres (Le Gonidec), Welsh ceirioes, ceiroes (Davies) ceirios (Pughe); or from O. or ME., as Irish siris (=shirish) (O'Reilly), Gaelic siris, sirist, Manx shillish. The fact that there is no native name in Celtic or Teutonic confirms the opinion of botanists that the tree is not indigenous to Britain or Western Europe.]

I. 1. A well-known stone-fruit; the pulpy drupe of certain species (or a sub-genus) of Prunus (N. O. Rosaceæ). When used without qualification it usually means the fruit of the cultivated tree (Prunus Cerasus or Cerasus vulgaris); of this, two forms are now also found wild in Britain; the more distinct of these, the common Wild Cherry or Gean, is sometimes considered a separate species (P. Avium).

Cherub (tʃe·rŭb). Pl. cherubs, cherubim (tʃe·rʊ̈bim). [OE. and ME. cherubin, ME. and mod. cherub; derived (through F., L., Gr.) from the Heb. of the OTest., where כְּרוּב k'rūb, pl. כְּרוּבִים k'rūbīm, are used as explained below. (It has no root or certain etymology in Hebrew, and its derivation is disputed.) From Heb. the word was adopted without translation by the LXX as χερούβ, χερουβίμ (-ἰν, -εἰν), also in N.T., Heb. ix. 5, and by the Vulgate as cherūb, cherūbīn, cherūbīm (the latter in the Clementine text). As the plural was popularly much better known than the sing. (e. g. in the Te Deum), the Romanic forms were all fashioned on cherubin, viz. It. cherubino, pl. -i, Sp. querubin, -es, Pg. querubin, cherubin, F. cherubin, pl. -s.

The earliest Eng. instances are of cerubin, cherubin, taken over from ecclesiastical Latin apparently as a foreign word, and treated implicitly as a singular, sometimes as a proper name, at other times as a collective. From the ME. period, the popular forms were, as in French, cherubin sing., cherubins plural. Cherubin survived in popular use to the 18th c.; but in the Bible translations, cherub was introduced from the Vulgate by Wyclif, was kept up by the 16th c. translators, and gradually drove cherubin into the position of an illiterate form. In the plural, cherubins is found from the 13th c.; and although in MSS. of the earlier Wyclifite version, cherubyn is more frequent (after the Vulgate), the later version has always cherubins; this was retained in ordinary use till the 17th c. But in the 16th c., acquaintance with the Heb. led Bible translators to substitute cherubims: this occurs only once in Coverdale, but always in the Bishops' Bible and version of 1611. From the beginning of the 17th c., cherubim began to be preferred by scholars (e. g. Milton) to cherubims, and has gradually taken its place; the Revised Version of 1881–5 has adopted it. A native plural cherubs arose early in the 16th c.; in Tindale, Coverdale and later versions (but not in that of 1611) it occurs beside cherubins, -ims; it is now the ordinary individual plural, the Biblical cherubim being more or less collective.

Briefly then, cherubin, cherubins are the original English forms, as still in French. But, in the process of Biblical translation, cherubin has been supplanted by cherub; and cherubins has been 'improved' successively to cherubims, cherubim; while, concurrently, cherub has been popularly fitted with a new plural cherubs.

The foreign form of the plural, coupled with the vagueness of the meaning in many passages, led to curious grammatical treatment even in MSS. of the LXX: here the Heb. sing. and pl. are normally reproduced as χερούβ, χερουβίμ (the latter taken in Gen. iii. 24 as a neuter plural, as it is in Heb. ix. 5), yet in Ps. xviii. 10 and the duplicate passage in 2 Sam. xxii. 11, and in 2 Chron. iii. 11, the Heb. sing. כרוב (of the Masoretic text) is represented by χερουβίμ, treated as a neuter singular (ἐπὶ τῷ χερουβίμ, τοῦ χερουβίμ τοῦ ἑτέρου). In the former case the Vulgate follows the LXX with cherubim. Since, in the Latin, there is, in many passages, nothing to show the number of cherubin, it is no cause of surprise that readers often took it as singular, and it is actually used as a sing. (masc. or neuter) in many mediæval Latin hymns and litanies.]

The history of the sense, or notion attached to the word, lies outside English, though English use reflects all its varieties. In the OTest. the cherubim are 'living creatures' with two or four wings, but the accounts of their form are not consistent: cf. the earlier notices with those of Ezekiel's vision (Ezek. i, x). They first appear in Genesis iii. 24, as guardians of the tree of life. This name was also given to the two images overlaid with gold placed with wings expanded over the mercy-seat in the Jewish tabernacle and temple, over which the shekinah or symbol of the divine presence was manifested. A frequent expression for the Divine Being was 'he that dwelleth (or sitteth) between (or on) the cherubim'. Psalm xviii. 10 (also contained in 2 Sam. xxii. 11) says of Jehovah 'He rode upon a cherub (LXX. cherubin), and did fly'. It is in connexion with this class of passages that the word first appears in English, and it is difficult to know exactly how the word was construed or used. The inclusion of the cherubim among angels appears to belong to Christian Mysticism. According to the 4th c. work attributed to Dionysius the Areopagite, the heavenly beings are divided into three hierarchies, each containing three orders or choirs, viz. (according to the received order) seraphim, cherubim, thrones; dominions, virtues (δυνάμεις), powers; principalities, archangels, angels. Cherubim were thus made the second of the nine orders, having the special attribute of knowledge and contemplation of divine things. Their angelic character is that which chiefly prevails in later notions and in Christian art.

2. In extant use: A being of a celestial or angelic order.

a. One of the 'living creatures' mentioned in the Old Testament, and figured in the Jewish Temple.

b. One of the second order of angels of the Dionysian hierarchy, reputed to excel specially in knowledge (as the seraphim in love); a conventional representation of such an angelic being in painting or sculpture.

As the Christian notion was simply super-imposed as a kind of gloss upon the Hebrew, the two are not usually separable in med.L. or Eng. Milton completely blends them, as did e.g. Durandus in his Rationale Divinorum Officiorum (1286). In early Christian art, cherubim were app. coloured red, but according to some, blue, the seraphim being red. In modern art, a cherub is usually represented as a beautiful winged child, or as consisting of a child's head with wings but no body.

[OE. cicen, pl. cicenu. In the same sense Du. has kieken, kuiken, MDu. kieken (kiekijn), kûken, MLG. and LG. küken, MHG. küchen; whence Ger. küchlein; also ON. kjúklingr (Sw. kjukling, Da. kylling). The relations between these words are not clear; some think that OE. cicen represents an earlier ciecen*, going back, with Du. kieken, to an OTeut. kiukīno*^{m}, a dim. of kiuk-* (cf. the ON.), an ablaut-form of kuk-*, whence cock.

But an OE. ciecen ought to have given in ME. chīchen; and the non-palatalization of the second c could be accounted for only by an OE. contraction ciecnes*, ciecnu*, etc. at a date anterior to that of palatalization. But in all the OE. and early ME. examples the word remains full and uncontracted.]

Child (tʃəild), sb. Pl. children (tʃi·ldrĕn). Forms: Sing. 1 cild, 2– child; also 2 cyld, 2–6 chyld, (4 chilld), 4–6 chylde, 4–7, 9 (arch. in sense 5) childe, (5 schyld); see also CHIELD. Pl.: see below. [OE. cild neut.:—OTeut. type kilþom* (OE. -ld from OTeut. -lþ) from root kilþ-*, whence also Goth. kilþei womb, inkilpô pregnant woman. Not found elsewhere: in the other WGer. langs. its place is taken by kind.

As the form of OHG., OS., OFris. kind is not satisfactorily explained from the root ken- (Aryan gen-) 'beget, bear', and is, for LG. at least, quite irregular, Prof. Sievers suggests the possibility that kind is a perversion of cild, kilþ-, by assimilation to the derivatives of root ken-, which may have spread from OHG. to OS. and Fris.

The OE. plural was normally cild; but in late OE. the word was partly assimilated to the neuter -os stems, making nom. pl. cildru, -ra, and esp. gen. pl. cildra. Ælfric, Grammar 23, gives nom. cild, gen. cildra, dat. cildum; but he also has nom. cildru (e. g. Hom. II. 324). No r forms occur in the earlier Vesp. Psalter nor in Northumbrian. The latter had cild and cildo; and sometimes made the word masc. with pl. cildas. In ME. there are rare instances of chyld, childe as plural; but the surviving type was OE. cildru, cildra, which gave ME. childre, childer: this was the regular northern and north midland form, and is still used in the dialects as far south as Shropsh., Leicester, and Lincolnsh. But in the south this was made childer-en, childre-n by conformation to the -en plurals: cf. brethre, brether, brethren, plurals of BROTHER. This has become the standard and literary form. The Old Northumbrian cildas is paralleled by childes in 15th c., which is exceptional; but the Sc. differentiated word CHIELD has always chields in plural.]

†5. A youth of gentle birth: used in ballads, and the like, as a kind of title. arch. When used by modern writers, commonly archaically spelt chylde or childe, for distinction's sake.

The precise force with which cild was used in OE. is not certain: Mr. Freeman (Norm. Conq. I. v. 374 note) merely concludes that 'it is clear that it was a title of dignity'. In 13th and 14th c. 'child' appears to have been applied to a young noble awaiting knighthood: e. g. in the romances of Ipomydon, Sir Tryamour, Torrent of Portugal, etc.

b. It has been pointed out that child or my child is by parents used more frequently (and longer) of, and to, a girl than a boy. Shakspere nowhere uses 'my child' of or to a son, but frequently of or to a daughter.

This is possibly connected with the use in 1 b; but is perhaps more due to the facts that girl has a wider range of application than boy, and that a daughter is more dependent on parental protection.

Chiltern (tʃi·ltəɹn). Also 6 chylturne, chiltorne, 8 chilturn. [Ciltern occurs as a proper name in the OE. Chron. anno 1009; but also, since 16th c., applied to a kind of soil or country. This may be from the proper name, though the converse is also possible; at present no explanation of the word is known.]

1. Proper name of a range of hills, in some parts wooded, which extend from the south of Oxfordshire, near Wallingford, quite across Buckinghamshire into Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire.

a 1125 O. E. Chron. (Laud MS.) an. 1009 Ða æfter middan wintra hi namon þa ænne upgang ut þurh Ciltern, and swa to Oxneforda. 1747 CARTE Hist. Eng. I. 483 The woodlands on the edge of Bucks and Hertfordshire, called the Chiltern.

2. Chiltern Hundreds: a name given to five (or more strictly four and a half) hundreds in Oxfordshire, and three in Buckinghamshire, which contain the Chiltern Hills. The manorial rights of these belonged to the Crown, which appointed over them Stewards and Bailiffs. These offices have long been obsolete or merely nominal, but that of the three Buckinghamshire hundreds (Stoke, Desborough, and Burnham) is the best known of several fictitious offices, now used for a special purpose. No member of parliament is by law at liberty to resign his seat, so long as he is duly qualified; on the other hand, a member who accepts an office of profit under the Crown must vacate his seat, subject to re-election. A member desiring to resign therefore applies for the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, or other similar appointment, which is, by a legal figment, held to be such an office; the appointment necessitates his resignation, and, having thus fulfilled its purpose, is again resigned, so as to be ready for conferment upon the next member that wishes to make the same use of it.

The holding of an office of profit under the Crown became a disqualification in 1707. It was not till 1740 that the Stewardship of a royal manor was used in order to create a disqualification. In that year Sir Watkin Wynn took the Stewardship of H: M. Lordship and Manor of Bromfield and Yale (which was again taken in 1749). In 1742 Ld. Middlesex took the Head Stewardship of H. M. Honour of Otford in Kent. In Jan. 1750–51 John Pitt, M.P. for Wrexham, took the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, which has come to be the ordinary form, except when a second resignation takes place before this is vacant.

Chime (tʃəim), sb.[1] Forms: 3–4 chymbe, chimbe, 4–6 chyme, 4, 7 chim, 5 chymme, (6 cheyme, cheime), 4– chime. [This and the verb of same form are of somewhat obscure history; but they were evidently derived in some way from L. cymbalum CYMBAL, in OE. cimbal, cimbala, which would naturally give a ME. chimbel, chimble. Cf. also MHG. zimbel, zimel m. and n., zimbele f. 'a small bell struck with a hammer.' But while ME. chimbe, chime, chim agrees with the first part of chimbel, the loss of the latter part is not clearly accounted for (cf. however much, lite, badde, from muchel, litel, bædel). Chimbe may however have been from OF.: Godefroy has a single instance of chimbe = cymbal. As to the passages in which 'cymbal' is expressed by chymbe belle, chymme belle, these may indicate that a ME. chimbel* was thus popularly understood and divided, making chimbe or chim a distinct word; but, on the other hand, if chimbe or chim already existed, the analysis of chimbel as chimbe bell would be equally natural. The following are the instances in question:

c 1300 K. Alis. 1852 Anon he doth his bemen blowe, v. c. [500] on a throwe. His chymbe belle he doth rynge, And doth dassche gret taborynge. c 1440 Promp. Parv. 75 Ch(y)mme belle [H. P. chyme bell], cimbalum].

II. China porcelain, China-ware, china.

[Throughout India, and the East generally, the Persian name چینی is widely diffused as chīnī, in the sense of 'porcelain', 'china-ware'. From India this form and use of the word was prob. introduced in the 17th c. into England, whence the spellings 7 chiney, cheny, cheney, chenea, mod. dial. chaney, cheenie, and the fashionable pronunciation of last and beginning of the present century, tʃē·ni (see Walker), which with tʃī·ni, tʃə·ni, still survives in the dialects.]

3. A species of earthenware of a fine semi-transparent texture, originally manufactured in China, and first brought to Europe in the 16th c. by the Portuguese, who named it porcelain. Early in 18th c. it began to be manufactured in Europe.

a. China-ware (which naturally occurs earlier than China) had at first the literal sense of 'ware from China'. This was soon shortened to China, and as the shortened form became gradually the common name of the material, 'china-ware' came to be regarded as 'ware made of china or porcelain', the sense it now bears.

For the Romance word Diez suggests an adoption of OHG. scina, MHG. schîne, which, among other things, meant 'needle, splinter,' perh. originally 'small piece of bone or metal'. The transition of sense would be parallel to that of L. spina, prickle, fishbone, backbone, and Ger. grat; the difficulty being the want of evidence, either in German or Romanic, for this transition. (Scheler Anhang, to Diez quotes from an It.-Ger. Gloss. in Mussafia 'schena, schinpein' shinbone, which may be thought to show some approximation.)]

Chink (tʃiŋk), sb.[1] [f. CHINK v.[1]; = northern KINK.] A convulsive gasp for breath, or spasmodic losing of the breath, as in hooping-cough; a convulsive fit of coughing or laughing.

[*a*1500 Pict. Voc. in Wr.-Wülcker 791 (Nom. Infirmitat.) Hec reuma, a chynge.] 1767 H. BROOKE Fool of Qual. iv, My Lord and Lady took such a chink of laughing, that it was some time before they could recover. 1855 MRS. GASKELL Cranford ix. (D.), The boys were in chinks of laughing.

Chink (tʃiŋk), sb.[2] Also 6 chynk(e, chincke, 7 chinke. [This and its verb, CHINK v.[2], are known only from the 16th c. There is nothing similar in Teutonic or Romanic.

In sense, chink is exactly equivalent to the earlier word CHINE (sb.[1]), and indeed its earliest known occurrence is in Berthelet's ed. of a work, where it has been substituted for chine, chynne of earlier MSS. and edd. And, although 'chynes and chynkes' occurs in 1545–64, it may be said that, generally, chink took the place of chine, between 1550 and 1580. It thus looks like a new formation on chine; but no satisfactory account of its origin can at present be offered. If chinch, CHINSE, is, as it appears to be, a variant of the verb, the whole may have to be referred to an earlier date.

Professor Skeat thinks it 'formed with an added k expressive of "diminution"'; but examples of this process in 15–16th c. are not known.

Wedgwood would identify it with CHINK[3], with the root notion of a sharp shrill sound, as in the chink of metal, and thence derive the sense of sudden fissure or fracture accompanied by such a sound. He compares the development of CRACK, 'sharp report' and then 'fissure', and of other words, in which actions are instinctively expressed by their associated sounds. (Cf. e.g. bang, bomb, bum, chap, clap, pop.) But the historical data are too scanty to establish this.]

Chirne, obs. form of CHURN.

Chiro-, chir-, = Gr. χειρο- combining form of χείρ hand, appearing in Greek in a very large number of words; several of these were adopted in Latin with the spelling chiro-, e.g. chīrographum, chīromantia, chīronomia, chīrothēca, chīrūrgia, and have thus passed into the modern langs.; many more have been taken by these directly from Greek, e.g. chirocracy, chiroscopy, chirosophy, chirotechny, or formed from Greek elements and on Greek analogies, as chiropodist, chirosopher. In modern technical terms, esp. those of botany and zoology, the spelling is often cheir-, e.g. cheiranthus, cheiroptera, cheirotherium.
